- a. In judging the possibility of a counteroffensive from Taiwan, we presume that before the Korean war goes to the extreme, the Nationalists will not carry out such an offensive.
- b. The key to the Korean war is: American imperialists will not change their policy toward Taiwan unless our air force participates in the Korean war to assist our ground forces.
- c. We will use our air force when our ground forces are under overwhelming pressure from United Nations troops and it is impossible to improve their position; United Nations forces receive a large number of reinforcements; the United Nations increases its naval forces or makes another landing; additional air raids are made over our coastal areas; or when our forces take full control of the situation at the 37th parallel and we have absolute confidence in driving out the enemy, we will take the final measure of strategic air bombardment of the enemy.
- d. Two main objectives of strategic air bombardment are destruction of United Nations supply lines and complete destruction of the Pusan base.
- e. We will use our navy when the Nationalists attempt a counteroffensive and if the United States attempts to reinforce the troops in Korea directly from Japan.
- f. We will mobilize our navy and air forces when America signs a peace treaty with Japan.
- g. We will assume an indeterminate policy toward the United Kingdom, since it is not yet time to take a stand toward her. If the United Kingdom unites with the United States in signing a peace treaty with Japan without giving support to China, we will use our air force to bomb Hong Kong.
- h. The time is now ripe for aiding Viet Minh in order to hinder United Nations troops.
